Stuart Sherman extols the verbal music of playwrights Regnard and Ives in The Heir Apparent
Welcome

Dear Friends,

We are thrilled to have you with us for The Heir Apparent. It marks our third production penned by the incomparable American playwright David Ives (following A Flea in Her Ear in 2006 and The School for Lies in 2013). To say that David has “a way with words” would be woefully understating the fact of the matter. His work is smart, funny, raucous—truly a singular voice of the American theater. Tony Award®-winning director John Rando and our talented cast, including Paxton Whitehead in his Chicago Shakespeare debut, have created a performance that is a veritable master class in comedic timing.

The Heir Apparent follows our sold-out, five-star productions of The Tempest and Ride the Cyclone this fall. Together with the recent announcement of the upcoming West Coast premiere of our musical adaptation of Jane Austen’s Sense and Sensibility, which graced our own stage last year, it is a thrilling time for our artistic collective. It is our privilege to develop and produce work that makes Chicago proud. And we are so appreciative of the role you play as an audience member.

Looking ahead to 2016, we hope you will join us for the yearlong celebration, Shakespeare 400 Chicago. This festival will position Chicago as host to the largest global celebration of the playwright as the world commemorates the 400th anniversary of Shakespeare’s legacy. We’re thrilled that 2016 will bring together our city’s leading cultural institutions and invite artists from around the world to make Chicago their stage as we honor Chicago Shakespeare’s “resident playwright.”

We hope to see you again soon.

Fresh from working with the Royal Shakespeare Company, Jonathan Munby returns to CST to bring Shakespeare’s most intimate tragedy, Othello, to life on the Courtyard Theater stage beginning February 18. CST audiences will remember Munby’s work from his 2013 production of Julius Caesar, which thrust the tale of betrayal into a modern American political landscape. On his upcoming production, Munby remarks, “Othello is one of the greatest psychological thrillers ever written. A masterpiece really and a study of human psychology—the power of manipulation and sort of a study of jealousy and what that makes us do.” For schedule and tickets, visit www.chicagoshakes.com.

Shakespeare 400 Chicago launches in early 2016 with extraordinary international work sitting alongside Chicago’s finest artists. The diverse array of presentations will showcase how the timeless words of our resident playwright continue to inspire creativity across artistic disciplines and cultures. One moment in time will see the concurrent work of: Hamburg Ballet’s Othello at the Harris Theater for Music and Dance; Lyric Opera’s staging of Romeo and Juliet; Cheek by Jowl and Moscow Pushkin Drama Theatre’s Measure for Measure at Chicago Shakespeare Theater; and Forced Entertainment’s (In)Complete Works: Tabletop Shakespeare from the UK at the Museum of Contemporary Art. To learn more about this astonishing citywide festival, check out www.shakespeare400chicago.com.

During the month of October, the CPS Shakespeare! ensemble of seventeen students and six teachers from Chicago Public Schools across our city turned CST’s rehearsal hall into a learning lab. Working with a full team of professional artists, they devised a unique forty-five-minute production of Shakespeare’s Macbeth performed at CST on November 6 and 7. The students were selected for CPS Shakespeare! by their teachers to take part in the immersive six-week experience. Recently, CPS Shakespeare! was awarded The National Arts and Humanities Youth Program Award by First Lady Michelle Obama at the White House. The program, and our broader education initiatives that impact 40,000 students and teachers annually, focus on arts engagement leading to increased academic achievement.

Sense and Sensibility, the new musical launched at Chicago Shakespeare by Tony Award®-nominated composer Paul Gordon, will make its West Coast premiere in 2016. Presented at the Old Globe Theatre in San Diego in association with Chicago Shakespeare, Sense and Sensibility will be directed by Artistic Director Barbara Gaines under continued development by CST Creative Producer Rick Boynton. Sense and Sensibility took home the 2015 Joseph Jefferson Award for Outstanding New Musical. For those wanting to continue enjoying the new musical’s score but who can’t find a way to the West Coast, the original cast recording is on sale for $20 in CST’s lobbies and online at www.chicagoshakes.com now.
A Conversation with the Director

Director John Rando talks about The Heir Apparent and its eighteenth and twenty-first century playwrights.

Marilyn Halperin: Can we start by talking about what it is that draws you so to this play?

John Rando: That fact that David Ives took Regnard’s eighteenth-century play, and reformed it through his very clever, fun, witty, brilliant poetry and language is a tempting reason for a director of my sort to want to do it. It’s one of the funniest plays of its genre, and then it’s enhanced by a contemporary playwright like David Ives. It’s this combination of wonderful French farce and contemporary comedy that pulls me to it. I love the dialogue between past and present. It has something to say about greed and about humanity and about finding salvation and charity. Those are all good reasons, I think, to do a play like this. Plus, it’s really entertaining. Audiences delight in it.

MH: You referred to yourself as ‘a director of my sort.’ Since this is our audience’s first introduction to your work, John, what “sort” of director is that?

JR: As a director, I often seek out comic material that has a message, that has potency, and classic comedy is a place that I love to look. I’m always looking at material that I find funny from the past, and am trying to make it fresh and alive for contemporary audiences. And in this particular case, I had this great contemporary playwright David Ives who’s able to do exactly that. The original Heir Apparent would still be on the shelf getting dusty, and here David has breathed life into it. The fact that these plays are having new life in America is something we should revel in.

MH: And why the work of Jean-François Regnard?

JR: Regnard’s considered a great, the father of the ‘well-made play’—and Le Légataire universel, his play that Heir Apparent is based upon, is one of the first of that genre. The well-made play happens in real time: it starts at the beginning and doesn’t stop until the story is over. There’s a hero and there’s one important prop that has to reveal itself—in this case, it’s the trunk with all the gold in it. Regnard’s plays are important works in European theatrical history. You can draw a direct line between his plays back through Molière to Italy and the commedia dell’arte. In the hands of a great writer like Regnard, these improvisational comedies of the commedia dell’arte are now solidly formed in a complete through-line to our modern theater.

MH: You have a long working partnership with David Ives. As someone who knows his writing inside out, how would you describe it?

JR: ‘Ivesian’ comedy, everything David does, is language-based, word-based. David has a tremendous ear for music and sound. His writing is like that. The way the words sound, the way they bounce off each other, is like music. In The Heir Apparent, he’s written a play in iambic pentameter and rhyming couplets, and it sounds very real and contemporary. It’s very funny and yet you recognize that it’s poetry, too. Even his non-poetic plays are poetry because his language can be so distilled.

If I had to point to the heart of what David does with his writing, it would be that language can transform humanity.

He has this philosophy and way of writing about the theater that it’s not enough just to be real. If I had to point to the heart of what David does with his writing, it would be that language can transform humanity, that language can unlock the heart. There aren’t many writers like David Ives in America. In fact, I don’t know of any. Many, many writers can do lots of other things, but they can’t do what David does with language and with comedy. At Chicago Shakespeare, audiences have seen David’s work already in A Flea in Her Ear and The School for Lies. These are all great plays that had been revisited by a great playwright.
MH: David Ives has said about your work, John, that you have him in your bones.

JR: As I talk, I realize that all this is the stuff that I, too, love about the theater. I have a passion for language, for the actor, for comedy, for an actor’s inventive nature. And so all of these things add up to this collaboration, which started twenty-plus years ago.

MH: Can you talk about the juxtaposition between this production’s contemporary language and its period costumes, setting and story?

JR: An eighteenth-century room, eighteenth-century frocks, and that fabulous, old beat-up robe for Geronte, the old man—all that ‘stuff’ is so important in creating the world. Then you let the writer make it fun and contemporary. You’re listening to period ideas, period meter and rhythm, alongside contemporary words—and yet some of the words are period too. There’s a mash-up, in a way, of the old and new. Just when you feel like you’ve settled into the language and period costumes, then something pops up in the language that surprises you. It’s embracing the time and place and, at the same time, not being so darn ‘museum piece’ about it.

The real goal is to try to enchant an audience, to delight them. When you update a classical play, it can damage the mystery and surprise because you still have to tell this story: there’s a dying man, he has to write his will, and can we get the guy to put this young man’s name on it? That story doesn’t really take place now; the social mores of our times are so different and an audience wouldn’t quite buy it in a contemporary setting. When you’re seeing it in period clothes, you recognize these social mores. They’re important to the heat, the friction, of the comedy; it’s where the sparks really fly.

MH: The sound of the language keeps coming back into this conversation.

JR: In Shakespeare’s time, people did not go ‘to see’ plays; they went ‘to hear’ plays, and this is a play that the audience is going to come and hear. What I loved about watching it on its feet in front of an audience was how they listened. You have to listen because it’s poetry, because you’re trying to figure out how is he going to rhyme that? And then he does. How did he do that? The audience loves to listen to this play, to the music of this play.

THE STORY
Paris, 1708. Eraste, in love with the lovely Isabelle, has a problem. Her mother, the dread Madame Argante, has stipulated that Eraste must be named sole heir to his miserly Uncle Geronte’s will or else Eraste cannot marry Isabelle. Eraste’s servant Crispin desperately desires this to happen because he’s in love with Lisette, Geronte’s maid. Nephew Eraste tries to wheedle himself into the old man’s graces when his uncle drops a bomb: not only is Eraste out of the will, the old man himself is planning to marry Isabelle—at three o’clock this afternoon. Matters get still worse for Geronte reveals his plans to leave large chunks of his fortune to two newly found relatives: a nephew from America and his niece, the pork heiress. Scruple, Geronte’s remarkably small lawyer, is due to come over and write up the old man’s will any second, so there’s no choice but for the young lovers and the two crafty servants to take matters into their own hands. Just wait and écoutez!

THE TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY AMERICAN PLAYWRIGHT
New York playwright David Ives situates his aesthetic on the knife’s edge between slapstick and substance. His honors include The MacArthur Award for Outstanding New Play and a 2012 Tony nomination for Best Play for Venus in Fur. He first burst on the scene with All in the Timing, an evening of six short plays on sundry subjects (including three chimpanzees attempting to write Hamlet and Trotsky trying to figure out what to do about the axe in his head). Ives also reworks classics, describing his process as “translaptation”—a way of “looking for the play beneath the words” that crosses translation and adaptation. For Ives, the process of translaptation requires more creation than renovation. “It’s my job to bring to an adaptation the energy of a playwright working on a new play.”

THE EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY FRENCH PLAYWRIGHT (in the words of David Ives)
Consider these tidbits from the life of Jean-François Regnard. First, that as your average young man of twenty-three gadding about the world he was taken prisoner in 1778 by Algerian pirates, sold into slavery, did six months’ hard labor, got ransomed, and when he arrived home hung his slave-chains on the wall in his Paris house. Second, that after a cushy Treasury job, he launched himself as a comic playwright at age thirty-eight and became the Next Big Thing after Molière. Third, that after he’d been buried 125 years, some kids found his skeleton when his church was being renovated and used his skull as a projectile. In other words, Regnard had an archetypal career as a playwright: a slave while alive, a football when dead.

Regnard (1655-1709), like his immediate predecessor Molière, drew heavily on the small but phenomenally fecund stockpile of character types with which the centuries-old Italian tradition of commedia dell’arte has imbued comedy ever since: two young lovers intent on marriage are thwarted by hidebound blocking agents (here a rich miser and a fuming gorgon) who withhold assent and cash, but are abetted by a clever servant or two (often themselves in love) who devise intricate capers to fulfill both their masters’ desires and their own.

Mozart’s The Marriage of Figaro is built like this. So is Sondheim’s A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum, itself a resurrection of the Roman-comedy prototypes that had fed into commedia dell’arte. So, in its way, is Seinfeld and many of its sitcom successors, where the appetites, inept but infinite, for cash and coupling remain the plots’ prime motivators. For us as for the commedia’s audience, the ease and abundance of available laughter depends on the familiarity of the character types, and the novelty of their predicaments and ingenuities.

The rhyme, though, is another story. We’re used to rhyme in musicals, where the surge into song warrants the liftoff in the language toward another passionate planet, livelier and more luminous than ours, where syllable echoes syllable with preternatural precision, but without any apparent effort on the part of the singers.

In spoken dialogue, by contrast, pervasive rhyming now runs the risk of overkill. But Regnard, and his dazzling twenty-first-century adapter David Ives, make a giddy case for it. What’s striking in The Heir Apparent is how deftly the rhyming dovetails with all that’s going on with both the plot and the characters. In The Heir Apparent, most of the good guys’ scams depend on quick, convincing disguises. And successful disguise is itself a kind of visual rhyme, with clothes and props in place of syllables.

Successful disguise is itself a kind of visual rhyme, with clothes and props in place of syllables.

Regnard enjoys this parallel so much that at one point he farcically compounds it: three of the schemers, oblivious to each other’s identical tactics, enter in swift succession, each disguised (with varying degrees of persuasiveness) as the same fourth character (whom in fact we’ll never see). While our ears absorb their frenzied improvisations in the face of this foul-up, our eyes take in the triple rhyme: clowning by way of cloning.

But amid all this chiming of plots and protagonists, why the need for actual rhyme at all? For Regnard as for Ives, the verbal music is indispensable: not excess but infrastructure. The rhyme not only reproduces the patterns of the plot in fast-moving miniature; it also makes subliminal, suasive arguments of its own.

Regnard’s first audiences would have found in his deft couplets a pleasing take on their specific cultural moment and shifting tastes. Commedia dell’arte, in its original form, had worked from loose scenarios sans dialogue; the performers improvised their speeches and almost everything else. French comedy, enthralled by the formula, also tweaked it, meshing the feverishly improvised ingenuities of the characters with the pyrotechnic verbal control on display in the impeccable rhymes and rhythms of the playwright.

This mix may have come naturally to Regnard. His name means fox, and he displayed throughout his career an extraordinary combination of control and improvisation. (As a devout gambler for example, he consistently made fortunes at the tables where others lost them.) And as a playwright, he began by sketching open scenarios for the commedia’s improvisers, before modulating to the clockwork comic dexterities of his virtuosic couplets.

Regnard’s rhymes remain delightful in part because he, and Ives in his metric footsteps, make them a kind of microcosm for the quasi-providential patterns endemic to most comedy. At one point in The Heir Apparent, the comedy’s crustiest blocking agent, in an epiphanic pivot toward magnanimity, discovers that he wants to marry a woman he’s long known. After all, he pleads to this sudden inamorata. “We’re soulmates … we rhyme.”

And so, Regnard suggests, do we—in our aspirations (where cash and ardor still loom large), in our passionate, precarious pursuit of them, in our unions with each other. Listening to the rhymes, we live them too.

Comedy comes from komos, the ancient Greek term for the dances of communal harmony that concluded all such shows. The sweetest subliminal message in Regnard’s rhymed schemes accomplishes something similar. We see and hear the onstage improvisers pursue their wildest, most harebrained schemes in clicking rhymes precisely timed, and absorb as if by osmosis an expanded sense of human possibility: the richness of our own language (so copious in its array of meshed and dancing syllables), and the potential in ourselves: the abundant gifts for thinking, acting, speaking—frantically, wittily, hopelessly, happily—bestowed on mortal minds. As the play’s febrile plotters voice their cunning and their panic in quick rhyme, we know of course that what we’re listening to, and laughing at, is in one way superhuman: no one on earth can be this smart, and this much fun.

But then, some are: Regnard the fox, for example, and his heir apparent, David Ives.
